In the minds of both disciples and antagonists, the Positive Philosophy means the philosophy of M. Comte; and to be imbued with the ideas of the Positive Philosophy means to be imbued with the ideas of M. Comte--to have received these ideas from M. Comte. After what has been said above, I need scarcely repeat that the conception thus inadvertently suggested, is a wrong one. M. Comte's brief enunciations of these general truths, gave me no clearer apprehensions of them than I had before. Such clarifications of ideas on these ultimate questions, as I can trace to any particular teacher, I owe to Sir William Hamilton. From the principles which M. Comte held in common with many preceding and contemporary thinkers, let us pass now to the principles that are distinctive of his system. Just as entirely as I agree with M. Comte on those cardinal doctrines which we jointly inherit; so entirely do I disagree with him on those cardinal doctrines which he propounds, and which determine the organization of his philosophy. The best way of showing this will be to compare, side by side, the--Propositions held by M. Comte. . . . chacune de nos conceptions principales, chaque branche de nos connaissances, passe successivement par trois états théoriques différents: letat théologique, ou fictif; letat métaphysique, ou abstrait; letat scientifique, ou positif. En d'autres termes, l'esprit humain, par sa nature, emploie successivement dans chacune de ses recherches trois méthodes de...
